Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: .I was hospitably received by my kind friend Mr. D., whose acquaintance I had made on board the Mongolia. Mongyr is a lovely little spot near the bend of the Ganges, where the great river, which has hitherto been running from west to east, turns more southward towards the sea. It is quite unlike Indian scenery in general, which is flat and uninteresting. The large grass-covered mounds of earth and ruins of a vast Mussulman fort, added to the natural undulations of the ground, produce a variety seldom seen in the plains of Bengal or Hindustan. Mongyr was much frequented as a military sanatarium before the extension of our frontier towards the northwest put it out of reach of the great part of the army. Though a little place, it is not without bright Christian testimony. There are several Europeans at Mongyr who love and serve the Lord: living in a simple and somewhat patriarchal way, they are known for Christian benevolence and the consecration of Oriental knowledge. As soon as I arrived here I received a message from the Church of England clergyman at Jamalpore, requesting that I would give an address to the educated natives in his town. Jamalpore was only six miles from Mongyr, and I had to pass through it on my journey next day. Anxious to make the meeting fully known, Mr. L. had sent round two Baboos or native gentlemen, one to the Europeans and the other to the educated...
