When anyone who is thirsty visits a well, they expect to quench their thirst and gain strength to sustain their lives. The church is meant to be a source of life, where those who are spiritually thirsty receive living water. But many are today disillusioned: Man-made rules, rituals and traditions have poisoned the well. How did this happen? The foundation for Christ's kingdom laid over the centuries has cleverly turned believers' minds to worldliness while retaining a spiritual appearance on the outside. In this book, the biblical basis of what a majority of Christians hold dear is held up to the scrutiny of scripture. The depressing results should cause serious concern among all Christians. A focus on materialism has progressively robbed Christians of the ability to grasp the abstract, spiritual truths contained in the New Testament. This poverty of understanding is so pervasive that every aspect of the Christian faith has been corrupted, leading to numerous false teachings and worthless rituals. This book aims at helping Christians to shed off this baggage and to focus on what real, life-transforming faith is all about. Many Christian leaders and writers have discerned God's move in our day and are actively involved in efforts aimed at restoration of the church to what it was in the first century. But they have failed to realize that the early church can only be an outpost on the way, not the destination itself. We have veered so far from the path of truth over the centuries that we needed to first check out this outpost in order to recover our bearing. But however commendable the efforts have been toward this goal, they are clearly insufficient. The destination we must aim for...
