Those who have read moderately have a wider range and give more intelligent opinions. In the earlier years girls prefer plots emphasizing patience; and many speak of some favorite novel as deep and mysterious; while boys look for action, at first physical and later moral. A large amount of cheap literature seems to paralyze and deaden opinion. Juvenile Fiction. --Girls read less juvenile fiction than boys do. Their line is continuously downward, and at the end of the third year they have practically finished. Boys seem to read more in the second than in the first year. This is, however, misleading and due to the second city, where the boys evidently had just heard of Barbours books and proceeded to make up for what they missed before. No attempt was made to separate good juvenile books from poor books....
